

Seeding Change is a national training base for young Asian American organizers. We steward the personal and political development of leaders working in frontline organizations that build the power of working-class Asian Americans for social, economic, and gender justice.

250+ Asian American young people trained (ages 18-28)

10 years of developing the movement infrastructure needed to organize our communities

33 partner organizations building power in working class communities

“ We’ve worked with Seeding Change since day one of our org. Eight years later, we have learned: we want our staff to have the skills, community, and perspective they can only get through Seeding Change. ”

fellowship

foundations of organizing principles and practice:

Fellows enter the field of organizing through a summer practicum at one of our partner organizations, bookended by a seven-day introductory intensive and a weekend closing retreat.

ongoing support:

Organizers meet monthly to give and receive coaching. It is a place to celebrate successes, think through challenges, and set goals for the lives and worlds we hope to build.

lifelong accompaniment:

Staff and alumnx committees convene national reunions, regional workshops, and other opportunities for our community to continue learning and growing with one another.

Seeding Change was a lesson in community healing that I will take with me for the rest of my life, and a model I try to emulate every day when I meet and work with Asian American youth today.

It kept me organizing for 9 more years when I wanted to quit in my first year.

of our alumni go on to become organizers beyond the fellowship.

Almost all stay in the movement: as teachers, counselors, cultural workers, and more.
